

Are there spiritual consequences to heart transplants?

In today's hyper-sympathetic world, saving people has become a personal crusade, as well as big business. Many embark upon this endeavor with their own preconceived ideas, without giving much thought to how or whether the remedy offered will bring the salvation needed by the people or person.

The excerpts below from the book The Book of the Last Judgement by Rose I. von Sass bring a new and different insight into the very common practice today of Heart transplants to save a patient's life. The book shows in no uncertain terms that the practice is not without dire spiritual consequences. Although it may extend physical life, it causes spiritual harm, that borders on a criminal act, for which the "life saver" and the patients become spiritually guilty and accountable.

The reasons given can be summarized as follows:

The heart still has to be "alive" to be transplanted into another body. For this reason, it must be extracted immediately after clinical death is declared. Nevertheless, the onset of clinical death does not mean that the deceased does not feel what happens with his earthly body..... At least, twenty-four hours must elapse before the threads that link the spirit and the soul with the earthly body are disconnected..... As long as all of these connection threads are not disconnected, the soul of the deceased will still feel everything that happens to the abandoned earthly body, and being so connected can still suffer the same pains a human being on Earth would feel if his heart were to be removed from his body without an anesthesia.

All these operations against nature are of little value..... The organs, particularly the heart, will always remain foreign bodies in another earthly body. On the surface, the organs and their functions appear identical in all human creatures. Nevertheless there are subtle fundamental differences that cannot be grasped by the intellect alone....Even if the transplanted heart carries out its functions for a while in another earthly body, the bearer of this strange heart will have little joy, for the deceased whose heart was "stolen" remains bound to this living heart, though it beats in somebody else's chest. And it will remain so till the death of the latter, when the heart that doesn't belong to that body finally decomposes.....

There is another issue regarding the heart! The deceased exerts, through his heart, a dominating influence over the person who bears this heart! It then seems that the person with the new heart has changed his character. Studies indicate that some patients report a change in their personalities, which they attributed to their new hearts. Some experience psychoses and eccentric behaviors, and some even start to show aggression immediately after the surgery.....

The anguish suffered by animals related to organ transplants is fruitless, because this crime against nature does not bring any ultimate benefit to science or mankind. Instead, the dire consequences that a person incurs by performing these deeds are especially harsh. Many cripples who on Earth today owe their deformities to crimes they committed against animals, in this or in previous lives..... In the beyond the effects of these offenses are even more appalling, for there the respective souls can only crawl. For them there is no upright walking, which is worthy of a human being. Crawling, they are gradually driven downwards, from plane to plane.....

With organ transplants, the era of modern cannibalism has begun! Cannibalism is the only correct definition, because the earthly bodies from which the organs are extracted are, in most cases, not entirely dead. Already, a macabre trade of organs is rampant and active. The poor, especially in third world countries, are now exploited as sources of cheap organs that are then sold at a huge profit to the medical establishments and professionals in the advanced economies.

This, in itself, already shows the ongoing unethical practices for which all who are involved in the supply and demand chain should expect to bear some responsibility and the resulting consequences under the spiritual laws that operate in creation.
